Does the WICA require that an employer who allows the use of personal protective equipment to protect an employee from workplace hazards provide such equipment in a safe working condition? To the best of my knowledge, the WICA does not require that an employer provide workers with personal protective equipment in a safe working condition. I know that OSHA does not require that personal protective equipment be provided in a safe working condition. Personal protective equipment is available from numerous vendors, and there are numerous facilities in the US that have adopted the use of personal protective equipment for the protection of their employees. I know that the WICA provides that an employer must make “reasonable efforts” to provide to his or her employees a safe and healthful place of employment. And, I know that OSHA provides that an employer shall furnish to his or her employees “such equipment, and the use of which is reasonably necessary” to eliminate the hazards. So, in answer to my question, it would seem that the WICA would not require that employers provide personal protective equipment in a safe working condition, whereas OSHA would require that the use of personal protective equipment be in a safe working condition. And, it would seem that any violation of the WICA would not amount to a violation of OSHA. Thanks for your help, and your comment about providing a safe working environment is very helpful. I just wanted to take the time to thank you for all of your helpful answers. I have appreciated your advice on various issues regarding OSHA, particularly with respect to the WICA. You are a real asset to this forum. As I stated in my previous response to this question, I have the highest regard for the work you have done and I am sure that you will continue to do very helpful things here 82157476af
